Sorghum Breeding Stocks Released

The Texas Agriculture Research Station (TARS) has released a new sorghum breeding stock that is expected to increase crop yields and improve the overall quality of sorghum.

The new stock, designated as TARS-234, was developed through a collaborative effort between TARS and the Texas A&M University's Department of Agronomy. The stock was created by crossing two high-yielding varieties, TARS-123 and TARS-345, which were selected for their resistance to various diseases and pests.

According to Dr. John Smith, lead researcher for the TARS breeding program, TARS-234 is expected to have a significant impact on the sorghum industry. "This new stock has shown promising results in field trials," said Dr. Smith. "It has the potential to increase yields by up to 20% compared to current varieties."
