Know Your Heritage

It's not often in the course of a year that one can reflect upon an issue of this importance, but that is what transpired last week when the United States Supreme Court ruled against a challenge to the government's policy of busing African-Americans and white students to improve educational opportunities. The case, which had been pending for more than a decade, was brought by the parents of white students who claimed that the policy violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court ruled that the policy was a constitutional measure to correct past discrimination.

In essence, the court held that the Equal Protection Clause does not require the government to achieve absolute parity in the quality of education among all public schools. Instead, it upheld the policy as a reasonable means of achieving a more diverse and integrated educational system.

The decision was hailed as a significant victory for civil rights advocates, who have long argued that the policy was necessary to overcome the legacy of segregation in the United States. The ruling is likely to have far-reaching implications, as other cities and states consider similar policies to improve educational opportunities for disadvantaged students.

While the decision is a major victory for civil rights, it also highlights the ongoing challenges facing our nation. Despite the progress made in recent years, the United States still faces significant barriers to educational opportunity, particularly for students of color. The court's decision underscores the importance of continued efforts to address these disparities and ensure that all students have access to a quality education.

Introducing Our Employees...

Meet Paul Cain

Paul Cain, the 19 year old son of Patsy and Mrs. Alan Cain, of Crockett, has joined the PACE Hardware & Lumber Co. for the past five years. Paul graduated from Carthage High School and is now attending Panola Junior College for the fall term. Paul says "I like helping people with their landscaping and water sitting, sidewalk and bricklaying work. At PACE, Paul works in the receiving and delivery department and in sales and he finds this work an easy, pleasant experience."
