Government From ‘The Bench’

"Government by delegation" is the characterization of a new, reorganized government by some. It is the idea that decisions are made by individuals who are not directly elected to office, but who are appointed to specific positions. This system has been implemented in the state of Texas, where the Governor and the Lieutenant Governor appoint members to various positions, such as cabinet members and legislators. The idea behind this system is to ensure that those in charge have the necessary expertise and experience to do their jobs effectively. However, this system has also been criticized for limiting the democratic process and making it difficult for citizens to hold their elected officials accountable.

The system of government by delegation also has implications for the role of the media. In the past, the media has been a watchdog for the government, holding elected officials accountable for their actions. However, in a system where decisions are made by appointed officials, the media may have less influence over the decision-making process. This could potentially lead to a lack of transparency and accountability in government.

In conclusion, the system of government by delegation is a complex issue that has both benefits and drawbacks. While it can provide a more efficient and effective way to make decisions, it also has the potential to limit the democratic process and create a lack of transparency. It is important for citizens to remain educated and engaged in their government, regardless of the system in place, in order to ensure that their voices are heard and their interests are represented.
