New Territory, An Old Problem

by Ed Brown

The idea of developing new territories for the United States is not a new one. In fact, the concept has been around for many years. The United States has always been expanding its territory, and this has been done through various means, such as the acquisition of land through treaties or purchases, or by military conquest.

However, the concept of developing new territories for the United States has also been met with resistance. Many people have been opposed to the idea of expanding the country's territory, either because they believe it is not in the best interest of the United States or because they believe it is not in the best interest of the people who live in the new territories.

The United States has always been a country of immigrants, and many of these immigrants have come from other countries to start new lives in the United States. However, the concept of developing new territories for the United States has been met with resistance from many of these immigrants, who believe that it is not in the best interest of the people who live in the new territories.
