Lack of voting privacy may be legal violation

An election official this week released the names of some people who voted in last week's general election. The panhandle's Department of State has been prompted to look into the matter.

A machine malfunctioned during the election, causing a delay in reporting results. Officials are looking into the situation to determine if any legal violations occurred.

A state law requires that voter privacy be protected during elections. Officials are trying to determine if the malfunction could have affected voter privacy.
