In Texas private waters Catfish is monarch

Although the large-spined sea catfish, also known as the channel catfish, is native to Texas, it is now found in many other states as well. It is a common species in the southern United States, where it is often found in freshwater bodies of water such as rivers, lakes, and ponds.

The large-spined sea catfish is a carnivore, feeding on a variety of other fish and aquatic invertebrates such as crayfish, shrimp, and other aquatic animals.

The large-spined sea catfish is a popular species for anglers, as it is known for its aggressive nature when it comes to catching. It is often found in rocky areas of the water, and will often strike at bait or lures thrown near the bottom.

Strength For Living
By Rev. Jerry Seaman

From the time we are born, we are learning how to live. As children, we learn to walk, talk, eat, and learn to take care of ourselves.

In the years that follow, we learn many other things. We learn how to read, write, and do math. We learn how to take care of our families. We learn how to work and earn our living.

Throughout our lives, we learn many things. We learn how to live. And that is what this column is about, finding strength for living.

First Things First

By Rev. Jerry Seaman

The things that we do every day are important to us. They shape who we are and what we become.

But sometimes we forget just how important they really are. We forget that our choices and actions have consequences.

We need to remember that what we do today will affect our lives tomorrow.

By Rev. Jerry Seaman

The things that we do every day are important to us. They shape who we are and what we become.

But sometimes we forget just how important they really are. We forget that our choices and actions have consequences.

We need to remember that what we do today will affect our lives tomorrow.
