University of Texas student hecklers boo Lt. Gov. Hobby from Senate gallery

The student protesters rioted on the Senate floor as the Legislature convened last week. The outburst was led by 150 members of the Concerned Student Group, who held up signs reading, "In support of the Earth," and "In support of the people." The protesters then launched a coordinated attack on the building, breaking windows and setting off smoke bombs. The incident caused widespread damage, including the destruction of several computer terminals and the theft of several valuable items. The protesters were eventually subdued by police, who arrested several of the leaders. The incident has sparked widespread outrage and a national debate on the role of student activism in American society. The students' actions have been condemned by many, including the university president and the governor of the state. However, others have defended the protesters, arguing that they were exercising their right to free speech and were simply expressing their dissatisfaction with the university's policies. The incident has raised questions about the role of student activism in the modern university and the balance between free speech and disorder.
