New Texas doctors growing more slowly

The number of new physicians in Texas is increasing more slowly compared to the mid-1980s, according to a report released by the University of Texas System.

In 1986, the Texas Medical Board reported that there were 4,844 new Texas physicians entering practice. This year, the number of new Texas physicians entering practice is expected to be around 3,000.

The report says that the number of new physicians entering practice in Texas has declined by about 30% since the mid-1980s. The report also notes that the number of new Texas physicians entering practice is expected to continue to decline in the coming years.

The report attributes the decline in the number of new physicians entering practice to several factors, including the rising cost of medical education, the increasing cost of living, and the increasing number of medical schools.

The report also notes that the number of new Texas physicians entering practice is expected to be lower than the number of new Texas physicians entering practice in the mid-1980s because of the increasing number of medical schools.

The report suggests that the number of new Texas physicians entering practice is expected to continue to decline in the coming years because of the increasing cost of medical education and the increasing cost of living.
