Congress should set capital gains rate

By Oscar C. Davis

Investment, tax-taking, and taxation are three of the most important issues facing Congress today. Congress should set capital gains rates to encourage savings and investment. It is through higher capital gains rates that the economy's growth can be sustained. Congress should ensure that the capital gains rates are set at a level that will encourage increased savings and investment. A capital gains rate that is too low will discourage savings and investment, while a rate that is too high will discourage consumption and lead to a decrease in economic growth. Congress should strike a balance that will encourage savings and investment while also ensuring that the tax system is fair and equitable. The future of the economy depends on Congress setting the right capital gains rates.
