Day-To-Day – The Constitutional Convention of 1787:

PHILADELPHIA. Monday, May 29, 1787 (May 28, New York) – The Constitutional Convention of 1787, which would later become the United States Constitution, was held in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. The convention was called to address the weaknesses and limitations of the Articles of Confederation. A group of delegates had already been chosen from each state, and they were housed in a building on Chestnut Street. The convention began on May 25, but it took several days for the delegates to arrive and begin working together. The convention lasted until September. It is said that on the ninth day of the convention, the delegates voted on whether to accept the Constitution or reject it. The Constitution was accepted and signed on September 17, 1787, and it went into effect on December 7, 1789.
