State tames tort law, turns to budget

The Legislature was poised to send Governor Clements a comprehensive tort reform bill aimed at controlling the state’s tort liability costs and expanding access to justice, but the governor held up the bill to seek additional recommendations from a blue-ribbon panel. The governor’s move came as a surprise to lawmakers who had been working on the issue for months. The panel was expected to recommend changes to the tort system that could help reduce costs and improve access to justice for Texans. However, the governor said the panel’s recommendations were not yet ready and she wanted to see more input from stakeholders. The legislation would have capped noneconomic damages, limited punitive damages, and prohibited juries from awarding non-economic damages in personal injury cases. It would also have allowed defendants to challenge expert testimony and limited the number of experts a plaintiff could use to support their claims. Clements was determined to keep costs down while ensuring that Texans had access to justice. Lawmakers were divided on the issue, with some supporting the governor’s position and others arguing that the legislation would hurt Texans by limiting their ability to recover for injuries and losses. The governor was resolute in her stance, saying that the legislation was necessary to keep the state’s tort system affordable and that Texans deserved better. The legislation was a key priority for the governor, who had made it a campaign promise. She was determined to deliver on her promise and ensure that Texans had access to justice. The legislation was expected to pass in the coming weeks, but the governor’s move to hold it up for further review could delay the process. The panel’s recommendations would be key in determining the final version of the legislation. The governor was confident that the panel would come up with recommendations that would satisfy both her and the lawmakers. She was determined to see the legislation through and ensure that Texans had access to justice.
Have you heard the story of the hot-dog vendor?

An elderly gentleman had been a hot-dog vendor for many years, in fact, he had very high standards. He made his hot dogs with care and sold the best hot dogs around. He advertised them so that every person around would know about his hot dogs. People from all around came to buy his hot dogs.

One day, his son came home from college and said, "Dad, you need to make some changes. Business is bad. How can you go out of business when you knew how to do it?"

The father replied, "But I don't want to go out of business. How can I go out of business when I have something to offer?"

Feeling that his son was more somewhere else, the father asked, "Well, I guess I have to do it. Tell me, what do I need to do?"

Stop spending money on all that advertising. Try spending money on your inventory and be consistent. The son advised him.

And so he did. He stopped his advertising and prepared fewer hot dogs every day and began to worry about the recession his son had told him about. And sure enough, customers stopped coming.

And the old man was stuck with the problem. He tried to advertise, but it didn't work. Then he tried to buy more hot dogs, but they still came around, and he didn't have enough to sell. The old man was being run over.

Then the old man came up with an idea. He started a new business. He started a new business. He started a new business.

Pretty soon, there were not enough customers to stay in business and the old man closed the hot-dog stand.

One day, as he sat on a park bench and read the newspaper, he saw an ad for a new hot-dog stand. He called up the owner and asked all the customers about the hot-dog vendor. He thought better tell him about the recession before its too late.

Regardless of the economy, your business is only as good as your advertising message.
