Day by day – The Constitutional Convention of 1787: Week Five: Virginia, New Jersey plans debated

Philadelphians on Monday, June 12, 1787, may have sensed that the fate of the nation was in their hands. In the weeks leading up to the Constitutional Convention, the nation was a union of 13 states, each with its own government and rules. The delegates who gathered in Philadelphia were charged with writing a new constitution for the United States of America.

The convention lasted from May 25 to September 17, 1787. It was a tense and sometimes acrimonious process, but the delegates eventually produced a document that would shape the nation for centuries to come. The Constitution established a federal system of government with a three-branch system: the legislative, executive, and judicial branches. It also created the office of the President of the United States, as well as the United States Supreme Court.

For the delegates, the convention was a significant event. It marked the first time in American history that representatives from all 13 states had come together to work on a common goal. The convention was not without its challenges, however. The delegates had to reconcile differences in representation, power distribution, and the role of states versus the federal government.

The Constitution was signed on September 17, 1787, and it has been the legal foundation of the United States ever since. It is a testament to the courage and vision of those who participated in the convention that America continues to thrive today.

The decision to fund the project was made based on the importance of preserving our historical records and ensuring that future generations can access this valuable information.
