Cape Town tea party ignored by bishop

A few weeks ago, when South African President Peter W. Botha, in a speech to the nation, made public the government's intention to move towards a constitutional system in which whites would participate as equals with other races, a Cape Town tea party was held. The theme for the gathering was "Equality for All," but the mood was one of frustration and anger, as many in attendance felt that the government's promises were merely lip service.

The part of the speech discussing the constitutional system was not mentioned, and the central theme of the event was the lack of progress towards equality. The mood was also darkened by reports of violence and unrest in other parts of the country, where the government's actions were being perceived as a betrayal of its promises.

The event was organized by a group of women who had been active in the women's rights movement, and they were joined by supporters from various groups. The mood was somber and the atmosphere tense, as people expressed their frustration at the slow pace of change and the government's failure to deliver on its promises.

The organization of the event was praised for its success in bringing together a diverse group of people, but there were also criticisms of the lack of coordination and the need for a more focused approach to achieving the goals of the movement.

The event highlighted the challenges facing the movement for equality, and the need for a stronger organizational structure and a more effective strategy for achieving its goals. The mood was one of determination, but also of realism, as people recognized the difficulties ahead.

The event was covered extensively in the media, with coverage ranging from news reports to editorials. The government's stance on the constitutional system was also highlighted, as people expressed their frustration at the lack of progress and the need for action.
