Congressman ready to grapple with 'challenge'

By DONALD COOPER

What makes a four-term congressman want to leave politics and make a bid for Texas attorney general?

That's the question many political analysts and observers are asking about U.S. Rep. John Bryan, who on Wednesday introduced himself as a candidate for the state's top legal post.

Bryan, a Dallas Democrat who is in his fourth term in Congress, said he decided to run for state attorney general because he feels the job is "too important to leave in the hands of someone else.'

"I decided it was time for a change," Bryan said. "I'm not one of those politicians who say they're not interested in running for office. I'm interested in running for office, but I didn't want to run for any other office. I want to run for attorney general because I think it's a position that's too important to leave in the hands of someone else."

Bryan's entry into the race for attorney general comes as the state's Democratic Party is facing a decision on whether to replace its incumbent attorney general, Jo Comerford, who is term-limited. Bryan said he is running as a "Democrat who is committed to the principles of the Democratic Party." He added that he believes he can appeal to both Democrats and independents.

"I think I can win this race," Bryan said. "I'm a strong supporter of the principles of the Democratic Party, but I'm also a strong supporter of the principles of the American people. I think I can appeal to both groups and win this race."

Days Gone By

Ann Morris is a member of the Dallas County Historical Society and a collection of Dallas County, Texas, as today's active society was organized in 1940 by the Dallas County Historical Society.

August 19, 1980

Ann Morris and her family moved to Dallas County, Texas, in 1940. The family was forced to leave their home in California due to the depression and move to Texas to find work. They lived in a small cabin near the Mississippi River, where they grew cotton and raised pigs.

Mike Smith of Dallas attended a meeting of the Dallas County Historical Society last week. He said the organization needs more members to continue its work.

Mike Vincent and his family visited Ann Morris last week. They said the family is planning a reunion next year.
