Republication gubernatorial nominee Clayton Williams is on his way to Carthage Tuesday. The oil baron, who is running for the Republican nomination in Texas, will spend two days in the city visiting with area Republicans before the primary election. He plans to campaign in some other areas Tuesday, but will make his first stop in Carthage.

Williams has been making the rounds of Texas cities to meet with voters and establish a presence in the Republican race. He has already visited Houston, Dallas, Austin, and San Antonio, and plans to continue his campaign in other areas.

Williams' visit to Carthage is expected to be significant as the city has a large Republican base. The campaign hopes to capitalize on this support and boost Williams' chances of winning the nomination.

Williams has been critical of his opponents, saying that they are not true conservatives and do not share his views on issues such as immigration and foreign policy. He has alsoaided in his campaign by raising significant amounts of money, which he plans to use to advertise and make phone calls to voters.

Williams' campaign has been gaining momentum in recent weeks, and he has seen a surge in support as voters become more familiar with his platform. The campaign is optimistic about their chances of winning the nomination and is working hard to ensure that Williams gets the backing of as many voters as possible.
