Redistricting moves may claim representative County might lose Johnson

When the traditionally Republican populated town in the state of Montana is redistricted, it is the custom to realign the political lines to more closely reflect the population of the time. The last such realignment, done in 1972, resulted in a shift where the Republican Party gained a majority. The next redistricting is expected to be completed in 1990, and it is feared that the changes may result in the loss of a congressional seat to the Democratic Party, which has controlled that seat for the past 30 years. The town is home to a large number of retired military personnel, many of whom are Republicans. The town is also known for its strong support of conservative values, particularly in religious and social matters. The potential loss of a congressional seat would be a major blow to the town's political landscape, as it would mean losing a voice in Congress and the possibility of seeing changes in federal policy that could affect the town negatively.
