Keeping kids off drugs

For Deputies Gee and Verhalen, it's more than just a job

By Lucia WONE
Life for the pinch-hitter deputiesDeputies George Gee and Steven Verhalen is a family on a mission. For the past 15 years, they've been helping children stay off drugs by giving them a taste of what life is like in jail. They've seen firsthand how the drug culture has taken over the community and want to make a difference.

"We're not going to let them throw us out," says Gee. "We're going to stay and fight for them." Verhalen agrees. "We're not going to let them win." They're determined to make a real difference in the lives of these children.

For almost two decades, the deputies have been going into classrooms and workplaces to talk about the dangers of drug use. They give speeches, distribute literature, and show off their own personal stories of addiction.

"We want to show them what it's like to be a drug addict," says Gee. "We want to show them what it's like to be in jail." They spend hours and hours of their own time and money to make sure they're getting their message across.

And it's working. The deputies have seen a drop in drug use among children in their community. They've even had a few children come forward to say they never want to use drugs.

But there's still a lot of work to be done. The drug culture is still strong in their community, and the deputies know they have to keep working.

"We're not going to give up," says Verhalen. "We're going to keep trying until we make a difference." They're determined to keep fighting until kids all around the world know what it's like to live drug-free.

Even if we get just one kid that will never try it, that will be worth it. Rachel Verhalen
