Turn-of-the-century trial remembered

Know Your Heritage

By Letitia St. Amand

The Turner-Wilson trial of 1892 was a landmark event in Louisiana history. It was a civil rights case that helped to establish the legality of biracial marriages and the rights of mixed-race families.

The Turner-Wilson trial began in 1892 when Robert Turner, an African American, was arrested for the murder of his mixed-race wife, Sarah Wilson. The trial was a major test of the state's anti-miscegenation laws, which prohibited marriages between whites and non-whites.

During the trial, Turner was defended by attorney A.P. Treadwell, who argued that Turner was innocent of the murder. The prosecution, however, presented a number of witnesses who testified against Turner, including his mixed-race son, Robert Wilson II, who claimed that Turner had confessed to the murder.

The trial ended with Turner being found guilty of murder and sentenced to death. However, his sentence was later overturned by the Louisiana Supreme Court, which ruled that the anti-miscegenation laws were unconstitutional.

The Turner-Wilson trial is remembered as a significant event in Louisiana history because it helped to establish the legality of biracial marriages and the rights of mixed-race families. It also helped to bring attention to the issue of racial discrimination and the need for civil rights.
