College hires new food service

By LAURA NEGRE
Palo Alto College student unions may face a new food service provider next spring as the food service provider at the Community College of San Antonio, Janss Foodservice, has ended its contract with the college.

The change in service providers will affect the college's food service options, including the dining hall, student cafe, and sustainability efforts.

The new provider, Janss Foodservice, is a company with experience in providing food service to educational institutions.

The change will impact students, faculty, and staff who rely on the college's food services.

College students will have a new option for food service, which may include changes to menu items and pricing.

Deciding on a living trust

Financial Focus

by Tom Crumley, CPA

Deciding whether to establish a living trust can be one of the most important decisions you will ever make. A living trust allows you to control how your assets will be managed and distributed after your death. It can also protect your assets from creditors and reduce the cost of probate.

A living trust is a legal document that sets forth the rules for the disposition of your assets. It is typically established by a revocable living trust agreement, which is a legal document that is created by the grantor (you) and is binding on the grantor's beneficiaries.

A living trust can also provide tax savings, including estate taxes, gift taxes, and inheritance taxes. It can also provide tax savings on the sale of your home, which is often the largest asset you have.

The cost of a living trust can vary depending on the size and complexity of your estate. A basic living trust can cost between $1,000 and $2,000, while a complex living trust can cost between $5,000 and $10,000.

A living trust can be a valuable tool for protecting your assets and reducing the cost of probate. However, it is important to carefully consider the costs and benefits of a living trust before deciding whether to establish one.
