Limiting exposure prevents rabies

By LUCIA PELLEGRINI

Rabbits, cats and dogs are susceptible to the disease, and their exposure can be prevented by limiting contact between them and wild animals that may carry the disease.

The disease of hemorrhagic disease, or hemorrhagic disease of rabbits, is a viral disease that is highly contagious and can be transmitted through direct contact with infected animals or through contact with contaminated food or water. It is characterized by fever, anorexia, loss of appetite, and a variety of other symptoms including vomiting, diarrhea, and difficulty breathing.

The disease is caused by a virus called hemorrhagic disease virus, which is spread through contact with the saliva, urine, or feces of infected animals. The virus can also be spread through contact with contaminated objects or surfaces.

The disease is most common in young animals, and it can be extremely deadly. The majority of cases occur in areas where there is a high density of wild animals, such as forests or parks.

The best way to prevent the disease is to limit contact with wild animals and to keep pets and livestock away from them. It is also important to keep pets and livestock away from areas where there is a high density of wild animals.

Budget reduced by appraisal district

A reduced budget for the appraisal district was approved by the Panola County Appraisal Board. The budget includes a 25% reduction in property tax rates, which will result in a lower property tax burden for residents.

The budget reduction was a result of efforts by the appraisal district to improve the efficiency of its operations and to reduce costs. The district has implemented a variety of strategies to reduce costs, including reducing the number of staff and using technology to improve the accuracy of property assessments.

Career counseling offered at schools

Career counseling services are available at Carthage ISD schools. The services are provided by counselors who work with students to help them make decisions about their future education and career goals.

The counselors provide individualized counseling to students, and they also offer group counseling sessions for students who may need additional support. The services are available to students of all ages, and they are provided at no cost.

PHARMACY TOPICS
By Phil Shellen, Registered Pharmacist

A recent study revealed the importance of drug adherence in chronic disease management. Non-adherence can lead to poorer health outcomes and increased healthcare costs. Pharmacists play a crucial role in helping patients adhere to their medication regimens.
