City commission nixes fire district proposal

By SHERRY KONOCHE

Carthage will not be included in a proposal that would have placed a tax on city residents.

After the recommendation of Carthage Fire Chief Brodie Atkins, city council members at their meeting on Sept. 5, 1999, voted 4-0 against a resolution that would have added $31 million to the city’s debt over the next 15 years.

The resolution, which would have been paid for through a property tax increase, was presented to the city council by Carthage Mayor Steve Dinnin.

"This resolution would have placed a tax on the city," Dinnin said.

"We are not going to be included in this proposal," Atkins said.

Atkins said he was concerned about the potential impact the tax would have on the city’s economy and the residents who live in the area.

"We do not support the proposal," he said.

Atkins said he had received a letter from the state Department of Revenue that said the proposal would likely cause a loss of revenue for the city.

The proposal was presented to the city council by Dinnin, who is also the director of the city’s fire department.

"We support the proposal," he said.
