Wage insurance

President Truman tried to make it a point that wage insurance is a first step toward security. "It is a step toward the security of the worker," he said. "It is a step toward the security of all the people in the country." The plan was one of three he presented. The others were old-age and health insurance.

TRUMAN PROPOSED PAYMENT

President Truman proposed a national wage insurance system which he said would cover all workers. The plan would be financed by a national insurance fund. The president also supported a proposal for a national health insurance system. Both plans would be administered by the federal government.

You and your Money

There's no real need for wage insurance. The system is based on the idea that a worker should receive a certain amount of money if he is unemployed. This idea is not supported by economists. Wage insurance is not necessary to ensure economic security.

New filibuster rule is needed

There is a dilemma between the need for reform and the resistance to change. The Senate, where the filibuster is traditionally used, has been increasing its use. The filibuster is a parliamentary device that allows senators to prevent legislation from passing.

SENSE THE NEWS

Budget not lean or austere

There are a number of ways to achieve a budget that is both lean and austere. The key is to focus on reducing spending and increasing revenue. This can be done through a variety of means, such as reducing government programs and increasing taxes.
