Tale of 3 judges

By Vic Parker

Three judges were sitting on the bench in the courtroom when the bailiff announced that the case was ready for the attorneys to present their case. The first judge was a strict and stern taskmaster, known for his decisive and often controversial rulings. The second judge was a more laid-back individual, with a gentle demeanor that made him popular among the courthouse regulars. The third judge was a seasoned veteran, known for his fairness and wisdom, but also for his occasional swipes at the other two judges' rulings.

The case at hand was a complex one, involving a dispute over a piece of land that had been the subject of a precedent-setting case years ago. The attorneys for both sides had prepared their cases meticulously, with charts and graphs to illustrate their points. The first judge moved quickly, asking the first attorney to begin presenting their case. As the presentation unfolded, the second judge took notes diligently, occasionally glancing toward the third judge for confirmation on a point. The third judge listened intently, occasionally nodding in agreement.

By the end of the presentation, the courtroom was abuzz with anticipation. The judges then retired to their chambers for deliberation, their doors closing with a quiet thud. The bailiff noticed the tension in the room and announced that the courtroom would be cleared. For the next few hours, the judges would deliberate in private, their decisions to be announced in the afternoon. The bailiff encouraged everyone to return to their offices, promising that justice would be served.

Sad soaps

Marshall Douglas

Sad soaps are one of the most challenging aspects of soap-making. They can be caused by a variety of factors, such as excessive moisture, improper temperature, or incorrect formulation. Here are some common causes and solutions:

1. Excessive Moisture: Over-hydration can cause soap to appear cloudy or saggy. Use a dehydrator to remove excess moisture.

2. Improper Temperature: Cold process soap-making requires the soap mass to be kept at a specific temperature to achieve a proper cure. Use a thermometer to monitor the temperature and adjust as needed.

3. Incorrect Formulation: Improperly formulated soap can cause a variety of issues, such as bad lather or a hard finish. Consult a soap-making guide or seek advice from a professional.

Remember, practice makes perfect. Keep experimenting and refining your soap-making technique to achieve the results you desire.
