SWEPCO official says local towns are hurting themselves

A representative official of the Southwestern Electric Power Company (SWEPCO) recently warned that local towns are hurting themselves by not exploring alternative energy sources and by failing to cooperate with SWEPCO on energy conservation measures.

Methodist Church, the First United Methodist Church, and the First Baptist Church of Beckville joined together to form a coalition to persuade SWEPCO to increase its renewable energy efforts.

"We need to start thinking outside the box," said the representative. "SWEPCO is not doing enough to encourage local towns to explore alternative energy sources, which could save us money and help the environment."
