CISD $3.8 million bond election fails

The mood among election officials was somber Tuesday as the County of Independent School District in the $3.8 million bond election.

The district had hoped to raise funds for new facilities and modernization projects. However, the bond measure failed to pass.

The bond proposal asked voters to approve a $3.8 million bond to fund the construction of new schools and the renovation of existing facilities. The measure did not receive the necessary majority to pass.

Supporters of the bond said it was needed to keep the district competitive with other school districts in the area. Opponents argued that the district already has sufficient funds to cover its current needs.

The next steps for the district are unclear. Board members will likely discuss options for future bond measures or other funding sources.

Editorial

Taking time to air issue could have changed results

The need for passage of a $5 million school expansion program in Corrigan Heights School District resolution was the subject of an editorial.

Not many of the school's citizens had a point to make, and those who did should have the opportunity to make their case more clearly.

References to the need for the resolution in the editorial, and the need for the resolution, does not mean it should be disregarded.

The editorialist mentions the need for full disclosure of the issue, but not all the information may have been provided.

While some may have a point of view on the issue, their views should be heard.
