Smokers get "least desirable areas"

By Alice Miller

As all smokers know, we have been pandas for years. At no time have we been more endangered by the health hazards of secondhand smoke. Along with our restaurants, the smoking restrictions have taken away our homes. As smoke inhalation has been the bane of our existence, we smokers have been the epitome of negative change. It seems that the world has turned against us.

We thought of these years as a kind of nirvana for us. We had an opportunity to be indoors with others again without the fear of being consumed by the smoke. We could sit and talk to our friends without having to worry about the effects of our smoking habits. We could breathe in peace and comfort.

Oh, but the good times were over. The world had changed, and we were left with nothing but the memory of our past. We could no longer enjoy the company of others in a smoke-free environment. We had to endure the constant reminder of our smoking habits.

As we sit here today, looking back on our past, we can only wonder what the future holds. Will we ever be able to find a safe haven where we can enjoy the company of others without the fear of being consumed by the smoke? Will we ever be able to find a place where we can breathe without the burden of our smoking habits?

In the end, we can only hope that the world will one day see us for who we truly are. Smokers are not the enemy. We are just trying to live our lives as best we can, and we deserve to be treated with respect and dignity. We hope that one day we will be able to find a place where we can finally be accepted for who we are.

Critical treatment saves rancher's soil

By Earl Chester

In a Panola County rancher's field, a group of workers were busy applying a treatment to the soil to save it from being washed away. The rancher, Mike Smith, had been struggling with soil erosion and was determined to find a solution. He contacted the Soil Conservation Service, who recommended a treatment to stabilize the soil.

The treatment involved using a mixture of clay and sand, as well as adding organic matter to improve the soil's structure. This was applied using a specialized machine that spread the mixture evenly across the field. The workers also created terraces to help control runoff and reduce erosion.

Mike Smith was impressed with the results. "I've been fighting this problem for years," he said. "I'm glad I found a solution that works."

The Soil Conservation Service is continuing to monitor the field to ensure that the treatment is effective. They recommend that the rancher continue to use the same treatment every year to maintain the soil's stability.
